Bar Code stands for "Barcode" and is an object mark used in a number of industries to identify a product or organization. Bar codes are often considered an important business tool, and are nearly ubiquitous in modern life. These codes serve to verify that a product is genuine and not a fake. A barcode consists of a series of black vertical and horizontal bars arranged in one or more rows and columns. The information encoded on a bar code is usually a series of letters and numbers. Different types of bar codes are identified by their encoding format, which refers to the number of horizontal and vertical bars on the symbol. Bar codes are commonly used in retail, particularly in the case of product packaging and shelf labels, where they can serve to provide customers with product information and track the quantities of different products. For organizations to make use of bar codes, they must be read by a barcode scanner or an optical character recognition (OCR) system.
