Episodes, 14 of 14, from Season 5, Vol. 1. Fathers' occupational exposures and children's health: a case-control study. Preliminary data suggested that the prevalence of asthma and other respiratory disease in children was associated with exposure of their fathers to respirable dust, lead, or formaldehyde. To confirm or refute this finding, analysis was conducted in a case-control study of 343 cases of asthma, 229 cases of bronchiolitis, and 118 cases of non-asthmatic respiratory disease, of children less than 6 years old in a population with high levels of risk for respiratory disease. Fathers of cases were significantly more likely than fathers of controls to be current smokers, more likely to have had lead exposure, and more likely to use aerosol based paints. With adjustment for these and other possible confounding factors, the odds ratios for asthma in exposed children with fathers who work in the presence of respirable dust were 1.5 (95% CI: 0.8-2.8) for exposed children with fathers who work in the presence of respirable dust, 2.1 (95% CI: 0.4-11.1) for exposed children with fathers who work in the presence of respirable lead, and 2.2 (95% CI: 1.0-4.7) for exposed children with fathers who work in the presence of respirable formaldehyde. This study extends previous results showing associations between environmental exposures and respiratory disease in children, and supports a hypothesis that environmental exposures, particularly respirable dust and lead, may be important in the development of asthma.
