1,600 Kids Who Make it to Surgery Alive Children are benefiting from a program that provides them with pediatric surgery, state-of-the-art medical technology and expert surgeon care. In 2014, more than 1,600 children survived their initial surgeries at the Children's Hospital at Holy Cross, a reflection of the partnership between the healthcare system and MetroMass, an independent health care system serving more than 100,000 residents in the suburbs of Boston. The program - funded by an anonymous donor at MetroMass – provides surgeries from the hospital's state-of-the-art hospital facilities in cases that would have otherwise not been afforded such care. The program also has a unique cadre of surgeons who provide expertise in pediatric surgery, including those who work with the program's first surgeon, Dr. Gregory Andrews. Andrews is an expert in dozens of areas of surgery, from organ transplants to pediatric and adult heart surgery. He said the greatest impact of providing pediatric surgery through the program has been the improvement in procedures and the quality of care that is provided. "Kids are better off because they come in, and they get the best surgeons and the best technology," Andrews said. A doctor with MetroMass for nearly 20 years, Andrews said the program is distinct because it focuses on children who are not able to provide consent, and not on life-and-death cases. About two-thirds of the children who are treated at the hospital receive care through the program. The difference in outcome is significant, the surgeon said. "In surgeries for tumors, for example, the average age in the United States is eight years old, but we are doing surgery for children down to one-and-a-half years old," Andrews said. One of the biggest benefits of the program is that it provides medical attention to children in the Boston area who otherwise wouldn't have it, he said. "We treat kids that are too young to travel," Andrews said. While the typical patient stays in the hospital for about a week, the charity programs have allowed many of the children to come home within 24 hours or less. Many of the children who have survived their surgeries have gone on to do great things in their lives, Andrews said. "To see an 8-year-old make it and have such a strong recovery, it
